My approach to supervision is based on the idea that growth is best nurtured by openness, analysis, challenge, and support. I work from a critical psychodynamic perspective, informed by Jungian psychology. This means that I believe that the unconscious is a factor in our work and also take into account context and power relations. In practice and supervision, I work to create a space where an honest confrontation with oneself and the world can happen. Sometimes this means analyzing and finding solutions for practical problems, and sometimes it means making sense of challenges within the broader unfolding of our experience.

I focus on the therapist as an instrument for change which includes analysis of discourse, identity, power relations, and the unconscious. I am also available to my supervisees as a business coach and consultant as they begin their journeys in private practice.
